Support the Journalism Competition and Preservation Act

Editorial: News publishers should have the ability to fight for fair compensation from Big Tech. Congress can help.

From the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Quality local journalism is essential for democracy, but for years the work of this news organization and others around the country have been victimized by the dominant practices of a few big tech companies.

Tech giants like Google and Facebook benefit from local news produced by newsrooms like ours, but they don't return that value to us. That is a serious threat to the economic viability of local news organizations.

To give local publishers a fair shake, members of the Wisconsin congressional delegation, along with their colleagues, should support the "Journalism Competition and Preservation Act."

Black journalists

For years, newsrooms have been encouraged to diversify their staff, their stories and their coverage. Unfortunately there has been minimal meaningful change in the industry, until the recent racial reckoning in America moved the needle a little more.

This has inspired the National Association of Black Journalists to create a new platform, NABJ Media Network, where it will work to tell and share often untold stories about Black communities through the work of Black journalists.
